

Zach's FAQs

Your Storytellers have run several games of Blood on the Clocktower, and are often asked about the following information:

- The Imp can attack themselves at night. If this occurs, the Storytellers choose a living minion to become the new Imp.
- The Imp can attack a dead player at night. If this occurs, there are no deaths that night.
- If the Imp attacks the Mayor, the Storytellers decide if the Mayor is attacked or another player is attacked instead.
- Any player can claim to be the Slayer and use the Slayer ability. The Storytellers will only announce if the Slayer ability kills a player who registers as the Demon; they will not confirm if a player is actually the Slayer. If a fake Slayer chooses a player, or if a real Slayer is unsuccessful, the Storytellers will announce that nothing happens.
- The Fortune Teller has a “Red Herring.” The “Red Herring” is not a character, it is a term the Storytellers use to refer to the good player that registers as evil to the Fortune Teller.
- The Empath learns how many of their living neighbors are evil. If one of the Empath's neighbors dies, they now have a new living neighbor.
- The Baron affects the distribution of character types (Townfolk, Outsiders, Minions, Demon). If the Baron is in play, the Storytellers will not tell the players that this distribution has changed.
- The Ravenkeeper does not get to use their ability if they are executed, only if they die at night.
- The Solider is safe from the Demon at night, but can still be executed during the day.
- A player protected by the Monk is safe from the Demon at night, but can still be executed during the day.
- If a player nominates a player and immediately dies, the nominee was definitely the Virgin and the nominator definitely registered as a Townfolk.
- Any player who drew a Townfolk character might actually be the Drunk. Players who drew an Outsider, Minion or Demon character know they are not the Drunk.
